After their parents' death, Javi Cisneros and his little brother, Nico, move from their home in Puerto Rico to live with their aunt. Something Wicked's in Those Woods is a novel by Marisa Montes about the experiences of Javi and Nico in their new home.

Javi and Nico leave their home in Puerto Rico to go live with their aunt in Northern California. They are left to cope with the loss of their parents and adjust to their new surroundings. The boys face the challenge of integrating into a new environment and navigating the complexities of their family heirlooms.

Something Wicked's in Those Woods combines several staples of middle-grade fiction—orphans, immigrants, and a ghost story. After the death of their parents, 11-year-old Javi and his younger brother Nico leave their home in Puerto Rico to go live with their aunt in Northern California. They are left to cope with the loss of their parents and adjust to their new surroundings.

The boy's new home, surrounded by dark woods, is a world removed from the one they had to leave behind in sunny Puerto Rico. When their parents died in a car crash, they will have another problem to face. They are left to cope with the loss of their parents and adjust to their new surroundings.

The boys experience the mourning of their parents' death in a car crash and face another problem to face. They are left to cope with the loss of their parents and adjust to their new surroundings. The boy's new home, surrounded by dark woods, is a world removed from the one they had to leave behind in sunny Puerto Rico.

Reactions and Reviews:
The book has received positive reactions and reviews from audiobooks.net, School Library Journal, Booklist, and Kirkus Reviews. The majority of reviews praise the story and the author's ability to capture the essence of a new environment.

In summary, Something Wicked's in Those Woods is a touching and well-crafted novel that explores themes of loss, adaptation, and new beginnings. It is a story about how family and love can help a child navigate through life's challenges.